F (ef), the sixth letter of the Roman alphabet, represents historically the 6th letter (waw) of the Semitic alphabet, which expressed the sounds of w (approximately) and the related vowel u. In early Greek writing the letter had at first the same twofold power; but subsequently its accidental varieties of form came to be differentiated in function, the form F (retaining the 6th place in the alphabet) being appropriated to the consonantal use, while V or Y served for the vowel, and is the source of the Roman U, V, Y, as explained under those letters. As the sound w was lost in the chief literary Greek dialects of the classical period, its sign F (called by the grammarians from its form the DIGAMMA) is not included in the later Gr. alphabet. In the Roman adoption of the Gr. alphabet the sound given to the 6th letter was the voiceless labiodental spirant (f). In OE the letter retained the sound (f) unless it stood between two vowels, when it was pronounced as the corresponding voiced spirant (v). In the S.W., according to some scholars, the voiced sound was used also initially. In mod. Eng. F is always sounded (f), exc. in the word of, where it is voiced to (v) through absence of stress.

In MSS. a capital F was often written as ff. A misunderstanding of this practice has caused the writing of Ff or ff at the beginning of certain family names, e.g. Ffienness, Ffoules.

The great difficulty is the anomalous representation of L. v by f; the apparent parallel in OF. feiz (mod. foir) = v is questionable, the f in that case being prob. due to sentence-combination. The ordinary view that fade descends from L. fatum foolish, also insipid (whence Pr. fatz fem. fade, in same sense), is inadmissible on phonological grounds; but it is possible that early confusion with this word may have given rise to the change of v into f. No OF. vade has been found, if it existed it would explain the Eng. vade, var. of FADE v., which is otherwise difficult to account for, as the Eng. dialects that have v for f usually retain f in Romance words. 3. Theol. in various specific applications. a. Belief in the truths of religion; belief in the authenticity of divine revelation (whether viewed as contained in Holy Scripture or in the teaching of the Church), and acceptance of the revealed doctrines. b. That kind of faith (distinctively called saving or justifying faith) by which, in the teaching of the N. T., a sinner is justified in the sight of God. This is very variously defined by theologians (see quots.), but there is general agreement in regarding it as a conviction practically operative on the character and will, and thus opposed to the mere intellectual assent to religious truth (sometimes called speculative faith). c. The spiritual apprehension of divine truths, or of realities beyond the reach of sensible experience or logical proof. By Christian writers often identified with the preceding; but not exclusively confined to Christian use. Often viewed as the exercise of a special faculty in the soul of man, or as the result of supernatural illumination.

Fake, var. of FEGS int.

Fake (fēk), sb.¹ Naud. Also 7, 9 fack. [Of obscure origin; cf. FAKE v.]

The MHG. vach had the sense 'fold' in addition to those of 'appointed place, portion of space or time, compartment'; if a similar sense belonged to the etymological equivalents OE. fæc (recorded in sense 'space of time'), MDu. vak (enclosure, partition), the word might come from either source. If it be identical with the Sc. FAIK sb. fold, a native origin seems probable.]

Fake (fēk), v. 2 slang. [Of obscure origin. There appears to be some ground for regarding it as a variant of the older FEAK, FEAQUE, which are prob. ad. Ger. fegen (or the equivalent Du. or L.G.) to furbish up, clean, sweep.

In Rowland's Martin Mark-ale 1610, a seager of loges is explained as meaning 'one who begs with false documents' (cf. to fake a screeve), and the modern fake away appears to correspond to the earlier fengelt away. The colloquial and jocular uses of the Ger. fegen closely resemble the senses mentioned in quot. 1812: amongst those given by Grimm are 'to clear out, plunder' (a chest, purse: cf. to fake a cly), 'to torment, ill treat'.

1. trans. In thieves' or vagrants' language: To perform any operation upon; to 'do', 'do for'; to plunder, wound, kill; to do up, put into shape; to tamper with, for the purpose of deception. In the last-mentioned application it has latterly come into wider colloquial use, esp. with reference to the 'cooking' or dressing-up of news, reports, etc., for the press. Also, To fake up.

1812 J. H. VAUX Flash Dict. s.v. To fake any person or place, to rob them; to fake a person may also imply to shoot, wound, or cut; to fake a man out and out, is to kill him; a man who inflicts wounds upon, or otherwise disfigures, himself, for any sinister purpose, is said to have faked himself; if a man's shoe happens to pinch or gall his foot, he will complain that his shoe fakes his foot sadly, i.e. to fake your slings, is to cut your irons in order to escape from custody; to fake your pin, is to create a sore leg, or to cut it, as if accidentally, in hopes, to get into the doctor's list, &c.; to fake a screeve is to write any letter or other paper; to fake a screw, is to shape out a skeleton or false key, for the purpose of screwing a particular place; to fake a cly is to pick a pocket. 1851 MAYHEW London Labour 352 The ring is made out of brass gilt buttons... it's faked up to rights. 1874 Punch 7 Mar. 188/1 Praps he'd a come to you with him [a horse] faked up for sale. 1885 Sporting Times 23 May 1/5 The chorister fair... faked herself up. 1885 H. 2. absol. or intr. To steal (only a literary misapprehension); also in fake away (see quots.).

1812 J. H. VAUX Flash Dict., Fake away, there's no down... go on with your operations, there is no sign of any alarm or detection. 1834 H. AINSWORTH Rootwood iii. v. 'Nix my dolly pals fake away.' 1860 READE Cloister & H. 111. iv. 82 They molest not beggars, unless they fake to boot, and then they drown us out of hand.

Fakement (fē'kment), slang. Also fakeman-charley. [f. as prec. + MENT; the origin of the longer form is unknown.] A piece of manipulation, contrivance, 'dodge'; vaguely, a thing, 'concern'; a trimming, decoration (on an article of clothing).

VAUX Flash Dict. s.v. Fakeman-charley, Speaking of any stolen property which has a private mark, one will say, there is a fakeman-charley on it; a forgery which is well executed is said to be a prime fakement; in a word, anything is liable to be termed a fakement, or a fakeman-charley, provided the person you address knows to what you allude. 1823 EGAN in *Grose's Dict. [late OE. fals adj. and sb., ad. L. fals-us false (neut. fals-um, used subst. in sense fraud, falsehood), orig. pa. pple. of falsare to deceive; cf. ON. fals sb. The adj. is found in OE. only in one doubtful instance (see sense 13); its frequent use begins in the 12th c., and was prob. due to a fresh adoption through the OF. fals, faus (mod. F. faux = Fr. fals, Sp., Pg., It. falso). The continental Teut. langs. adopted the word in an altered form: MHG. valsch, mod. G. falsch cf. OHG. gīfalsch to falsify, OFris. falsch, Du. valsch, late Icel. (15th c.) falskr, Da., Sw. falsk.

The etymological sense of L. falsus is 'deceived, mistaken' (of persons), 'erroneous' (of opinions, etc.). The transition to the active sense 'deceitful' is shown in phrases like falsa fides 'breach of trust, faithlessness', where the sb. has a subjective and an objective sense. In mod. Eng. the sense 'mendacious' is so prominent that the word must often be avoided as discourteous in contexts where the etymological equivalent in other Teut. langs. or in Romanic would be quite unobjectionable. Some of the uses are adopted from Fr., and represent senses that never became English.]

Falt, obs. form of FALUT.

Falter, var. of FAULTER, Obs., defaulteur.

Falter (fɒlˈtɜː, fɒlˈtɜː), v. 1 Forms: 5 faltir, 6 [in Fisher falter, floghter], foltter, 6-9 falter, (7 foultter), 7 felter, 4- falter. [Of obscure etymology.]

The current view, which connects the word with fault, is untenable, on the ground that falter has always been written with the f, and is so pronounced in the dialects in which it occurs, whereas in fault the f is an etymologizing insertion, which rarely occurs in spelling before 16th c., and was not pronounced, even by educated speakers, till much later. (But it is not unlikely that association with fault may have coloured the recent use of the word.) It seems possible that sense 1, 'to stumble', may have been developed from the sense '1. to be entangled' (FALTER v.). On the other hand it is noteworthy that M.E. falden, FOLD v. is used of the limbs and the tongue in the sense 'to give way, fall, falter'; perh. falter may be a frequentative of falden, formed irregularly through the influence of approximately synonymous vbs. like batter, tatter, welter.

1. Of a person or his steps; also of a horse: To stumble, stagger; to walk with an unsteady gait.

'a making visible', f. φανταζειν to make visible, f. φαίνω to show.

The senses of φαντασία from which the senses of the word in the mod. langs. are developed are: 1. appearance, in late Gr. esp. spectral apparition, phantom (so L. phantasia in Vulg.; 2. the mental process or faculty of sensuous perception; 3. the mental faculty of imagination. These senses passed through OF. into Eng. together with others (as delusive fancy, false or unfounded notion, caprice, etc.) which had been developed in late L., Romanic, or Fr. The shortened form Fancy, which apparently originated in the 15th c., had in the time of Shakspeare become more or less differentiated in sense. After the revival of Greek learning, the longer form was often spelt phantasy, and its meaning was influenced by the Gr. etymon. In mod. use fantasy and phantasy, in spite of their identity in sound and in ultimate etymology, tend to be apprehended as separate words, the predominant sense of the former being 'caprice, whim, fanciful invention', while that of the latter is 'imagination, visionary notion'.]

Farce (färs), sb.² Also 6-7 farse, 6 Sc. farseche. [a. (in 16th c.) F. farce, app. a metaphorical use of farce stuffing; see prec.]

The history of the sense appears to be as follows: In the 13th c. the word (in latinized form farsa, farsia) was applied in France and England to the various phrases interpolated in litanyes between the words kyrie and eleison (e.g. 'Kyrie, genitor ingenuit, vera essentia, eleison'); to similar expansions of other liturgical formulae; and to expository or hortatory passages in French (sometimes in rime) which were inserted between the Latin sentences in chanting the epistle. (The related vb. farsire, OF. farsir to stuff, hence to 'pad out', interlard, was used in the same connexion in the expressions epistola farsita, un benedicamus farsit. See Du Cange s.v. farsita, farsia, and Burney Hist. Music II. 256.) Subsequently the OF. farce, with similar notion, occurs as the name for the extemporaneous amplification or 'gag', or the interludes of impromptu buffoonery, which the actors in the religious dramas were accustomed to interpolate into their text. Hence the transition to the modern sense is easy. (The Eccl. Lat. farsa, farsire, referred to above, have been anglicized by mod. writers on liturgical antiquities as FARSE sb. and v.)

Sk. par, pr to carry through or across, Gr. poros way, passage, ford, L. portare to carry; also the words mentioned under FAR, FOR. The change from the strong to the weak conjugation seems to have been due in part to the influence of the derivative vb. Fere, which in Eng. had the same sense, though in the other Teut. langs. its equivalent expressed the transitive sense 'to carry'. In the present stem this vb. became obsolete before 14th c.; and its pa. t. and pa. pple. ferde (in northern dialects also fardie) continued in use, virtually serving as inflections of fare. The irregular wk. vb. thus produced (fere, fard) became regular (fare, fared) before the 16th c. The strong pa. t., already comparatively infrequent in ME., seldom appears after 15th c. exc. in Sc.; of the strong pa. pple. we have no examples after 16th c.]

'Not found outside Eng., and no satisfactory Teut. etymology has been proposed. On the assumption that the primary sense was 'fixed portion of provisions, ration', it would be admissible to regard the word as a late L. firma, and so ultimately identical with Farm sb.² In Domesday Book firma unius noctis is equivalent to anes nites feorme of quot. c 1122 below; and mediaeval Lat. writers in England used firma in the sense of 'banquet'. If the hypothesis of its Latin origin be correct, the word must have been adopted at a very early date: it occurs frequently in the oldest poetry. The derivative feorman to feed, is found in the Corpus Glossary a 800 ('foet', foemat, broedeþ'; the corresponding OHG. gloss. 'foet', foet' in St. Gall. MS. 913 may be derived from an OE. source, the vb. being otherwise unknown in OHG.)

Farther (fārdə), adv. and a. Forms: 3-6 forder, ferdre, 4 ferpor(e), 4-6 ferther, 4-8 farder, 5- farther. [ME. ferper (whence by normal phonetic development farther) is in origin a mere variant of FURTHER, due prob. to the analogy of the vb. ferpren:—OE. fyrðrian to FURTHER. The primary sense of farther, farther is 'more forward, more onward'; but this sense is practically coincident with that of the comparative degree of far, where the latter word refers to real or attributed motion in some particular direction. Hence farther, farther came to be used as the comparative of far; first in the special application just mentioned, and ultimately in all senses, displacing the regular comparative farrier. In standard Eng. the form farther is usually preferred where the word is intended to be the comparative of far, while further is used where the notion of far is altogether absent; there is a large intermediate class of instances in which the choice between the two forms is arbitrary.]

Father (fā'ðə), sb. Forms: 1-3 fæder (1-yr), feder, (3 leader), 2-6 fader, (3 Orm. fader), (south. dial. 3 væder, veder, 3-4 vader), 3-4 fadre, 4-5 fadir (e, -ur), 6-yr, 4 faper, 6-father. [Com. Tent. and Aryan: OE. fæder corresponds to OFris. feder, fader, OS. fadar, fader (LG. Du. vader, vaar), OHG. fater (MHG. and mod.G. vater), ON. fæder, -ir (Sw., Da. fader, far), Goth. fadar (found only Gal. iv. 6, the ordinary word being atta):—OTent. fader, ? fader—OAryan pāter (pāter, pātr), whence Skr. pītr, Gr. patrōr, L. pater, OIr. athir.

The spelling in our quotes is uniformly with d until 16th c., exc. that fader occurs sporadically in the Cotton and Göttingen MSS. of the Cursor Mundi (a 1300); but the pronunciation (ð) may have been widely current in the 15th c. or even earlier; in 14-15th c. the spelling with -der is very common in words like brother, father, leather, though this spelling cannot in all cases be supposed to indicate that the writers pronounced the words with (ð). The mod.Eng. -ther (ð) for OE. -der, -dor in father and mother is often wrongly said to be due to the analogy of brother, or to Scandinavian influence; it is really the result of a phonetic law common to the great majority of Eng. dialects; other examples in standard Eng. are gather, either, together, weather. At present nearly all dialects pronounce father and mother with (ð) as in standard Eng.; in various parts of the north of England and the north Lowlands (d), alveolar or dental, is sometimes heard. The representation of OE. x, a by (ð) in this word is anomalous; the only parallel case, setting aside the class of instances in which the symbol (a) is used in this Dic., is rather. Among the chief variant pronunciations in dialects are fa'dər, fə'dər (by writers of dialect books often spell faither, seyther), fə'dər, Se. fr'dər, etc.

In OE. the genitive had the two forms fæder (cf. OS. fader, OHG. fater, ON. födur) and fæderes. The uninflected form survived in occasional use down to the 15th c.]

e. As a prefix to the name of a priest. Also abbreviated F., Fr.

Formerly, as still in Continental use, restricted to the regular clergy (see b). In the present century this has become the customary English mode of designating a Roman Catholic priest, even among those not of his own communion: but some secular priests still refuse the title as incorrect, preferring to be addressed as 'The Rev. A. B.' The abbreviated forms are seldom used exc. by Roman Catholics.

As the prefix 'Father' was in the 16th c. used only with the names of members of religious orders, its use was of course not continued in the reformed Church of England. Of late years the title has been applied, among a section of the High Church party, to Anglican priests, and some prominent members of that section are very commonly designated by it.

Faubourg (fôbur). Forms: 5 faubourgh, fabo(u)r, 6 faubor, (foubour), (fourbourgh), 7-8 fauburgh, 7-9 faubourgh, 9 fauberg, 7- faubourg. [late ME. faubourgh, fabo(u)r, a. F. faubourg. From the 15th c. to the beginning of the 17th c. the word was more or less naturalized, esp. in Scotland; it is now used only as foreign, with Fr. pronunciation or (more frequently) semi-anglicized as fô-bûr, -bûrg.

Littre considers faubourg, formerly also spelt fauz-bourg (= false borough) to be a corruption of the earlier-recorded synonym forsbourg (f. fors outside + bourg borough), which is the source of some of the Eng. forms given above. The word faubourg, fauz-bourg, seems not to be known in F. before 15th c., but its existence in 1380 is implied by L. falsus burgus in a charter cited by Du Cange. Its origin may possibly be found in the MHG. phalburgere (also spelt phalburgere), which according to German scholars originally meant 'burghers of the pale', i.e. 'persons living outside the city wall but within the palisade'; it afterwards denoted a special class of non-resident burghers, having only partial civil rights. The word occurs frequently in the imperial charters of 13-14th c., sometimes latinized as phalburgenses; and a charter of 1365, according to a French translation given by Laguille (1727) speaks of 'des faux bourgeois dits en allemand Phalburguers'. From these facts it seems not unlikely that faubourg, fauz-bourg, may have been evolved from phalburgere or its punning translation falsus burgensis, fauz bourgense.]

2. A tap for drawing liquor from a barrel, etc. Now dial. and U.S.

Formerly more fully spigot and fauisset, denoting an old form of tap, still used in some parts of England, consisting of a straight wooden tube, one end of which is tapering to be driven into a hole in the barrel, while the other end is closed by a peg or screw. The peg or screw when loosened allows the liquor to flow out through a hole in the under side of the tube. Properly, the spigot seems to have been the tube, and the fauisset the peg or screw (as still in the Sheffield dialect); but in some examples the senses are reversed, and each of the words has been used for the entire apparatus. In the U.S. fauisset is now the ordinary word for a tap of any kind.

The OF. word had all the uses found in Eng., so that there is no ground for treating sense 3 of the sb. as a distinct word, though it is possible that it may have been associated by some ME. writers with OF. favelle idle talk, cajolery:—L. fabella, dim. of fabula FABLE. The phrase 'to curry favell', OF. estriuer, torcher Favell, comes from the Roman de Fawell (1310), the hero of which is a counterpart of Reynard the Fox (see P. Paris, MSS. Bibl. du Roi I. 306); it has been adopted in Ger. as den fahlen hengst streichen. It is not clear whether before the date of this poem a 'fallow' horse was proverbial as the symbol of dishonesty: the same notion is found in German, 'to ride the fallow horse' (den fahlen hengst reiten—recorded from 1511 c.) having the sense 'to play an underhand game, act deceitfully'.]

A. adj. Of a horse: = FALLOW a. 1 (The exact colour denoted by the adj. in early use is uncertain.) c 1489 CANTON Sonnet of Aymon i. 33 There came rydnye a messenger vpon a horse fauell.

B. sb.

2. The fallow horse proverbial as the type of fraud, cunning, or duplicity. Only in phrase To curry favell: see CURRY v. 5 a.

3. Hence used as a mere personification of cunning or duplicity.
